The master of public health (MPH) in community-oriented primary care trains health professionals and public health practitioners to implement and evaluate evidence-based interventions to improve community health, clinical care, outcomes, and patient experience, while lowering health care costs and decreasing health disparities.

Join other students whose “real life” culminating experiences have included early childhood literacy programs, hospice care, childhood obesity, medication coverage for the elderly, use of geographic information systems to improve access to care, and community health promoter training in Mexico.

Most courses are scheduled in the late afternoons and early evening allow our students to work while pursuing their degree. If you have a job, you may need to arrange with your employer to take a class in the afternoon.
