

MASTER OF PUBLIC HEALTH (MPH@GW), CLIMATE AND HEALTH CONCENTRATION

Program Director: G. Gray

In the master of public health (MPH@GW), climate and health concentration program, students gain a multidisciplinary knowledge base and skill set that provide them a framework for transforming how health issues associated with anthropogenic climate change and global environmental change are addressed. Graduates understand the scientific foundations of climate change and environmental health, the social dimensions of health risks associated with climate change, the policies and practices that can mitigate these health risks, and how to communicate about these subjects.

Program graduates will be able to:

- Analyze health risks from anthropogenic climate change and global environmental change using methods and research findings from the epidemiological, environmental exposure assessment, and implementation sciences;
- Communicate about the effects of climate change and environmental degradation to varied audiences, including both technical and non-technical audiences; and
- Manage diverse teams to design, implement, and evaluate actions to advance systemic change towards mitigating health risks from climate change and environmental degradation, for example through governmental mitigation and adaptation policies, urban planning, public engagement, corporate action, and finance.

Students leave the program prepared for leadership careers in catalyzing systemic change that mitigates health risks from climate change and environmental degradation. Career paths include government, nongovernmental organizations, research and academia, multilateral organizations, media, consulting, and industry, opening doors wherever solutions to climate change and environmental health happen.
